

Stroking Stones

Quote by Lissy Boesen:

Ideas arise while watching the creative play of children on sculptures, upended trees, big stones and similar objects. You can see how they almost automatically begin to climb. They play "cops and robbers" or make believe the stones are a fortress. However, places such as these can be dangerous to play on as they are often rough, sharp edged or have protruding pieces. Why not instead offer the children a concrete sculpture which allows them to develop their powers of imagination and fulfils their desire to climb without any danger of hurting themselves?

Play value

The gentle nature of these play and art figures and their quiet expressions create an atmosphere of peace which facilitates a friendly encounter with the animals. The stone animals are ideal to stroke, touch and feel or incorporated into role-play games. Play figures such as these strengthen the identity of an area.

The stone animals can be integrated into role-play activities or the children can climb carefully on their back and sit or lie there. And above all: they can be touched, felt and stroked. Small children and particularly girls, also when they are a little older, enjoy and need this. And even adults enjoy the experience of touching the gentle curves and shapes.
